

Altova to Showcase XML Tools at Wall Street on Java Technology Show & Conference

New XMLSPY 5 Release 3 features to be demonstrated, including Java Integration Support

Beverly, Mass., January 29, 2003 – Altova, Inc., maker of the world's leading product family of XML development tools and winner of Java Developer Journal's Readers Choice Award for "Best XML Editor", will be exhibiting at the third annual 2003 Wall Street on Java Technology Show & Conference, which is being held February 4-5, at the Metropolitan Pavilion in New York City, booth #100.

Altova will be highlighting new features included in XMLSPY 5 Release 3 through ongoing software demonstrations presented by XMLSPY Engineers. One such feature includes new support for Java-based Integration of third-party products and utilities with XMLSPY through a new Java Application Program Interface (API) which enables programmers to control and use of XMLSPY functionality from their Java-based programs.

"Both XML and Java naturally lend themselves to building Wall Street financial applications because of the open nature of the technologies," said Alexander Falk, President & CEO of Altova. "New XMLSPY features such as the Java-API will further enable easy Java-based integration and customization of the XMLSPY development environment."

Altova's XMLSPY 5 is a powerful XML Development Environment, and is widely used by Java developers to perform editing operations on common Java J2EE file types, JavaServer Pages (JSP), and Java Code Generation. Altova is a technology partner with major Java Server vendors including IONA and BEA, and has hundreds of major Wall Street Institutions as customers, including Morgan Stanley, Merrill Lynch, and Price Waterhouse Coopers.
